

Are You Playing the Game or is the Game Playing You?

If you were setting up Your own Game Of Coaching, what would the rules be?

1. What rules would keep you on track?
2. What rules would you want others to play by?
3. What rules would you use to discern who was qualified to play your game?
4. What rules would maintain structure of the game?
5. What rules would best support you?

PLRK!

Try this game with Rules...list a rule then find a legitimate reason for breaking it. Here's one. "You must stop at Red Lights." Well, under certain conditions, such as rushing my son to the hospital in an emergency, I will break this rule and probably get away with it.

How about another one, "You must choose a niche in order to succeed in coaching." Oh really? That's news to me since I never chose a niche. I must have broken that one eight times. So it's curious to me and others, how I became a successful coach. Over time several niches seem to have chosen me including niches like: rock bands, leadership and teamwork with executives, people in career transition that want to feel fulfilled and expressed by their work, and mentor coaching. As of today my current niche is...

"People who want to coach with me that I want to coach."
